'Internet Lingo' Presents Communications Challenge for Parents

The Internet has changed the world in many wonderful ways and has successfully created a new channel for rapid communication through chat, instant messaging, and email.

Although children initially began using the Internet to do research for homework, they now spend the majority of their computer time socializing. According to the Childwise research agency survey, children spend an average of 1.7 hours a day online, and one in six children spend more than three hours a day online. Sixty-two percent of kids surveyed have a profile on a social networking site.

As a result of this popularity, many diligent parents have decided it's not only a right but a responsibility to understand what their children do at the computer and on the Internet. They try to make sure their kids are protected from inappropriate content and people, but one of the basic parenting stumbling blocks is understanding the "lingo" kids use in their online communications.

For example, if you saw "KPC" in a child's writing, would "Keeping Parents Clueless" come to mind? Probably not, because many parents are just that – clueless – when it comes to what is often termed 'Internet Lingo'.

This lingo – consisting of codes and acronyms – is widely used in today's chat rooms, instant messaging, emails, text messaging, blogs, and on the immensely popular social networking sites like MySpace, Facebook, and Twitter. Despite the widespread use, a recent report revealed 95 percent of parents surveyed could not decipher common acronyms used in Internet chat and messaging.

Powerful Software Makes It Perfectly Clear

Monitoring software programs like Spector Pro are designed to protect kids from the Internet's dark side and shed light on what otherwise might be puzzling activities. Spector Pro records everything a child does at the PC and on the Internet – including MySpace and Facebook activity – so parents will know exactly what their child is doing.

Using Spector Pro, a concerned parent can guard against Internet predators by recording every detail of a child's chats, keystrokes typed, web sites visited, online searches, emails sent and received, and programs run. Further, with Spector Pro's advanced screen snapshot feature, parents can see not only what their child has done, but the exact order in which they have done it, step by step.

In addition, Spector Pro includes an exclusive, innovative mouseover/rollover technique capable of revealing the hidden meaning behind Internet

Lingo ... lingo you'll likely find in your child's daily PC communications. Using this feature, you simply pass your mouse pointer over a codeword or acronym you don't understand, and the meaning will be shown to you onscreen.

Special Offer – 40% OFF Spector Pro

If you are concerned about who your children are conversing with online and exactly what they are talking about, Spector Pro is right for you. And we'd like to help you get started with a Special Offer of $99.95 (Regularly $169.95).
